OUR STORY:

The Branch Water; A nod to the Southern traditions of drinking a "Bourbon and Branch," which refers to the small streams, or branches, that deliver the water used by Bourbon distillers. The idea is to add a little bit of that same water to the finished spirit to make a clean, refreshing drink that retains the essence of the whiskey. Branch water is preferable if filtered, removing iron from the water.

Iron would discolor the Bourbon. Kentucky Bourbon is made with limestone-filtered water. Because part of the state of Kentucky sits on an ancient limestone aquifer, it is known as the world's Bourbon capital. Limestone-filtered water is also very smooth on the palate and thus is the perfect mixer for Bourbon.

Nowadays, Branch is simply a term many Bourbon drinkers use for water.
